

Questioning Finance After the Crisis

Raising the question of change

As the debris begins to settle in the wake of the financial implosion, it is time to raise the question of change. The political economy of global finance is not at a standstill. New actors emerge and new practices take on heightened significance. Ameliorative regulation is designed but with perhaps unintended consequences. To steal a phrase, the music did stop but the dance goes on.

This symposium seeks to open up debate as to the overall direction of travel. It draws out the implications of regulation in the form of:

- The financial transactions tax for the social utility of the financial system.
- Newly empowered actors in the form of central banks and credit risk rating service providers for assessing trajectory.
- Newly considered significant aspects of old markets in the form of fiscal arbitrage via financial derivatives for the state.

We welcome all to the debate and look forward to making a start on identifying finance after the crisis.
